PREFACE.

CROYDON PUBLIC LIBRARIES
CENTRAL

PREFACE.

I.

The present volume contains the extant Exchequer accounts of the first nine yearly audits of the reign of James IV., namely, from 1488 to 1496 inclusive, consisting of the burgh accounts of all these years, and the accounts of the Crown lands for the same years except 1493, also an account of the Comptroller of the Household, written on paper and in book form, two separate and not quite identical copies of which have been preserved, both in a rather mutilated condition. The place of audit was most frequently Edinburgh or Stirling, sometimes Linlithgow; and the time of meeting of the Exchequer was generally in June, the audit going on till August. An account of the bailies of Inverness for a disturbed period was rendered at that burgh in the month of November; and the account of the Comptroller was, agreeably to usual practice, audited at a separate diet held in January 1492–3.

In this volume, as in the last, an Appendix is added with the Rentals of the Crown lands for its period and the continuation of the Index to the Responde Books from 1492 to 1496. The years from 1484 to 1491 are a blank in this Index, the Libri Responsionum for those years having probably been lost before it was made.

The following remarks bear chiefly on the light thrown by these records of the general history of the time, including the closing scene of the reign of James III.

The negotiations alluded to in the Preface to volume ninth, for the marriage of James III. with the widow of Edward IV., and of his sons with the daughters of Henry VII., seem to have been cut short by James stipulating for the surrender of Berwick as a condition. The émeute at Lauder had undoubtedly had the effect of rousing the King to a better sense of his regal duties, and leading him to turn his attention as he had never before done to the administration of justice and suppression of crime. But the faction of the Earl of Angus, conscious that their past conduct was beyond forgiveness, saw danger in the strengthening of the royal authority, and, renewing their intrigues with England, set themselves to organise a fresh revolutionary movement. In May 1488 a safe conduct was granted by Henry VII. to the Bishops of Glasgow and Dunkeld, the Earl of Argyle, Lord Hailes, Lord Lyle, the Master of Darnley, and the Master of Hume, all of whom are known to have belonged to the faction hostile to the King.[1]

[1] Rotuli Scotiæ, ii. 485.

James Schaw of Sauchie, who had been Chamberlain of Stirlingshire throughout most of the reign of James III., and been made Keeper of Stirling Castle by that King,[1] was ready at the call of these conspirators to betray the trust which had been reposed in him. Angus' party gaining through him possession of the person of the Prince, now in his fifteenth year, inflamed his ambition with the prospect of a crown, and used every artifice to poison his mind against his father. It may be that their aim was to depose the King and confer the regency on the young Prince, rather than to adopt any measures directly affecting the King's life: but they were at least at all hazards resolved to make it impossible for James to reign.

Next to Angus the most prominent in the ranks of the conspirators were the Master of Hume, the head of the house of Hepburn, Lords Gray and Lyle, and John Lord Drummond, who had been recently made a Lord of Parliament. There was a special cause for the dissatisfaction of the Humes, James having some years previously annexed to the chapel royal founded by him in Stirling Castle the revenues of the priory of Coldingham, a religious establishment to which that family considered that they had something like a patrimonial right. The annexation obtained the papal confirmation in 1487: and an Act of the same year, which declared opposition to the King's scheme to be treason, helped to kindle into a flame the smouldering torch of rebellion. The southern part of the kingdom having become a scene of revolt and violence, James by a sudden move made his way through Angus to Aberdeen, where he found himself at the head of a large following.[1]

Returning southwards in May with a numerous retinue, including Athole, Huntly, Erroll, Crawford, Lindsay of the Byres, and Ruthven, he encountered the rebels at Blackness, where, after an indecisive skirmish, negotiations were opened, and articles of agreement entered into, which resulted in the disbanding of the royal army, and a virtual triumph to the malcontents. In the brief interval before the final outbreak, James rewarded with lands and titles some of the most devoted of his followers, making the Earl of Crawford Duke of Montrose, and Lord Kilmaurs Earl of Glencairn. He bestowed the title of Duke of Ross on his second son, whom, rather than the misguided prince who now headed his enemies, he began to regard as his prospective successor. But no sooner had the King taken up his residence in Edinburgh Castle than the insurgents were again in arms; and proceeding to Stirling with a hastily assembled force, he committed his fortune to a battle on St Barnabas' day (11th June) 1488, when, almost on the spot where

[1] The Chamberlain of Moray in 1489 and 1491 accounts for two chalders of wheat sent by the late King from Moray to Aberdeen, and is allowed £6, 10s. for the transport of them by six horses, it being at that time impossible to get horses of husbandmen to convey them.—Pages 85, 192.

Bruce's crowning victory was won, the royal army was worsted; and the King, bruised and stunned by a fall from his horse, was carried into a cottage, and stabbed by one of his pursuers. His body was recovered, and interred (on the 25th June according to Buchanan) beside that of his Queen in Cambuskenneth Abbey.[1]

A characteristic incident of the conflict, which we learn from the accounts in this volume, is that James carried with him to this inglorious Bannockburn a sword that had been wielded by the great King Robert. It was lost on the field, and afterwards found by one Walter Simson, along with a coffer containing £4000 in money. In reward for his recovery of the weapon and treasure, James IV. bestowed on Simson for life those parts of the lands of Cessintuly and Coldoch known as Donaldyoungistoun and Wattesmethistoun.[2]

No time was lost by the successful party in assuming and exercising regal functions in the name of the boy-King. On the 12th of June, the very day after Sauchieburn, the Great Seal Register contains the appointment of William Hepburn, vicar of Linlithgow, to the offices of Clerk of the

[1] The tomb of James III. and his consort was restored by order of Her Majesty in 1865.

[2] Pages 82, 187, 502, 682. The records of the beginning of the new reign contain mention of other coffers recovered and delivered to James IV.'s Treasurer, in which were contained a portion of the wealth which James III. had made himself so unpopular by amassing (Treasurers' Accounts, i. pp. 85, 86, 87). Much of the treasure in question was lost in the confusion of that period: but the inventory of what of it remained in the treasury and jewel-house of Edinburgh Castle is curious and interesting (Ibid., p. 79).

Council and Clerk Register.[1] The coronation took place at Scone in the last week of June; and a number of new appointments in favour of the leaders of the party now in power had been made before the meeting of Exchequer, which was held at Stirling, where the King then was, on the 7th July. The Earl of Argyle, who had been deprived of the chancellorship by the late King, as having been in arms against him, was reinstated in that office. Alexander Master of Hume, otherwise called Alexander Hume of that Ilk, grandson and heir-apparent of Lord Hume, was made Great Chamberlain in place of the late King's friend the Earl of Crawford, otherwise Duke of Montrose. The Abbot of Arbroath was superseded in the post of Treasurer by Sir William Knollis, Preceptor of Torphichen, generally designed Lord of St John of Jerusalem,[2] who had already held the same office for a short time in 1469, and was now also made Keeper of Blackness Castle and Sheriff of Linlithgow. Lords Lyle and Glammis became Justiciaries to the south and north of Forth respectively. While the Earl of Angus, who was guardian of the King's person, and for a time retained the office of Warden of the East Marches, the most prominent persons in the realm were the representatives of the two allied border houses of Hume and Hepburn. Hume, who on the death of his grandfather two years later succeeded to the honours and estates of his family, wielded a power and authority which no other Great Chamberlain had possessed since the functions of that officer had been limited by James I. The wardenship of the East Marches was transferred to his hands from those of Angus;[1] he was Bailie of Ettrick Forest and Keeper of Newark Castle,[2] Ranger of the Ward of Yarrow,[3] Keeper of Stirling Castle,[4] Steward of the earldom of March,[5] and guardian of the King's brother John, who had been made Earl of Mar:[6] and large portions of Ettrick Forest were leased to him free of rent.[7] Lord Hailes, in addition to the mastership of the household, had the offices of guardian of the Duke of Ross,[8] Keeper of the Castles of Edinburgh[9] and Threave,[10] Warden of the West and Middle Marches,[11] and Sheriff of Berwick;[12] and while extensive portions of Galloway and Ettrick Forest were let to him, he obtained the lands of Bothwell with the dignity of Earl, and the post of High Admiral.[13]

[2] The Preceptor, Prior, or Master of Torphichen, who was the head of the Knights Hospitallers in Scotland, possessed a singular half-lay half-clerical character. He derived his appointment from the Grand Master of the Order at Rhodes, but was confirmed in the temporal barony of Torphichen by the King: and in the records of Parliament he is sometimes assigned a place among the Priors and Abbots, and sometimes among the Barons.

The other members of the Hume and Hepburn families had their full share of offices and emoluments. The Chamberlain's brother, John Hume of Ersilton, was master of the King's Wardrobe, with a salary of twenty marks from Cockburn,[1] and was put in possession of Todrig and other lands in Merse:[2] his three uncles, George Hume of Aytoun, Patrick Hume of Fastcastle, and Thomas Hume of Langschaw, all became possessors by lease or feu-charter of lands in Merse, Ettrick Forest, and Stewartoun free of rent. George further obtained in feu the lands of Rossy in Fife formerly occupied by James Bonar, who fell on the late King's side,[3] as also lands forfeited by Lord Lyle when the latter turned against James IV.:[4] and Patrick was King's butler.[5] The Chamberlainship of Stirlingshire and of Strathern fell to another kinsman of the Great Chamberlain, Patrick Hume of Polwarth. Among Hepburns who figure in this volume are Lord Hailes' brother, Adam Hepburn of Ogston, master of the King's Stable; John Hepburn of Rollandston, principal Steward of the Household; George Hepburn, Director of Chancery;[6] Patrick Hepburn of Beynstoun, Steward and Chamberlain of Fife and Keeper of Falkland Palace;[7] and another Patrick, Master of the King's Larder and of his Cellar,[1] besides William, the Clerk Register already mentioned.

Schaw of Sauchie, in addition to his chamberlainship of Stirlingshire, had the office of Keeper of Stirling Castle conferred on him.[2] The favour shown to Sir Archibald Edmonston of Duntreath, his retention of the office of Keeper of Doune Castle, and possession of an office in the household,[3] point to his having sided with his father-in-law, the laird of Sauchie, in the late struggle. We have occasional mention of another active adherent of the same side, William Stirling of Keir, who had had his tower of Keir burned down by the loyal party, and was, according to Buchanan and Hume of Godscroft, one of three persons who lay under suspicion of being the direct instrument of the King's death. To indemnify him for the destruction of Keir, he received £100 immediately after the accession of James IV.:[4] and soon afterwards £1000 was ordered to be paid him on the same ground by Sir Adam Murray.[5] He was also knighted, and, on the narrative that his writs had been destroyed by fire when Keir was burned by James III. at the instigation of wicked counsellors, he had a new charter of his whole lands united into a barony.[6] We find him in the Rolls having a lease of the portion of Ratherne belonging to the Crown, whose fermes and grassums were allowed him,[1] and also of Balcarres in Fife.[2]

Another favourite of the King, attached in some capacity to his household, whose name appears in this volume, is Walter Ker of Cessfurd and Cavertoun, ancestor of the Roxburghe family. On 3rd August 1488, in respect of the singular favour borne him by the King, and in reward for signal services, he had a charter of the Castle, castlestead, place, and messuage of Roxburgh, with the patronage of the Hospital of Maison Dieu there.[3] He is, as in the former reign, tenant of Bourhope and Eaststead of Windydurris in Ettrick Forest,[4] and is allowed to receive the petty customs of Jedburgh.[5]

The Rolls and Rentals show considerable inversion of the tenancy of the Crown lands, in favour, among others, of Lord Drummond, who obtained the office of Steward of Stratherne.[6] John Liddale having been found in arms against the King "in campo prope Glasgw," his holding of Aleburne in Ettrick Forest is transferred to Alexander Inglis, archdeacon of St Andrews, the Comptroller.[7] At the first letting of Menteith, David Balfour, who had been a servant of the King when Prince,[1] is to lose his holding of Banks of Row "si fuerit probatum quod fuit contra regem;"[2] but he probably cleared himself of suspicion, as he is found tenant again in 1490.[3]

But while devotedness to James III. was generally construed as treason to James IV., there were a few of the staunchest adherents of the late King in whose case it seems to have been assumed that the same conscientious principle of loyalty to their sovereign which had attached them to the father would keep them faithful to the son. The Duke of Montrose or Earl of Crawford had, even before the meeting of Parliament in October, a full remission under the Privy Seal. The same was extended to the famous sea captain Sir Andrew Wood, notwithstanding the boldness of speech which he is said to have used to the Council immediately after Sauchieburn. It was rightly presumed that his allegiance would be unhesitatingly transferred from his dead master to that master's heir: and as early as the 27th July the party in power granted him a renewal of his feu-charter of Largo.[4]

The first Parliament of James IV. met at Edinburgh on 6th October 1488. The larger number of those recorded as present had taken a more or less prominent part against the late King, including the Earls of Angus and Argyll, Lord Hailes, the Master of Hume, Lords Glammis, Lyle, Gray, and Drummond; also Lord Darnley[1] and his son, who figure for the first time under the designations of Earl and Master of Lennox.

At this Parliament all grants of James III. subsequent to the preceding 2nd of February in prejudice of "the Crown that now is" were rescinded, and such holders of hereditary offices as were believed to be of the late King's party were suspended from their functions for three years. The preservation of the peace was entrusted to the leading partizans of the present King, each of whom had a district assigned him. The Earl of Buchan (uncle to the

[1] The versatile political career of Lord Darnley (always so styled in the accounts of this as of previous volumes) was throughout subservient to his persistent design of possessing himself per fas aut nefas of the earldom of Lennox, of which he was only a junior coheir. For a time the chief obstacle in his way was James III.'s Chancellor Lord Avandale, who, though but a bastard descendant of the eldest of the three coheiresses, acquired in 1471 the liferent of the whole Lennox territory. Darnley also ingratiated himself with James III., under whom he was made Keeper of Rothesay Castle, and had large payments from the fermes of Moray and Bute: and that King's interest in him is shown by an extra payment made to him when lying ill at Kinloss with a broken thigh (vol. vii. page 638). Avandale and Darnley were both ungrateful enough to take part in the raid of Lauder Bridge, for which Avandale was disgraced and deprived of the office of Chancellor, while the more astute Darnley succeeded in posing as the protector of the imprisoned King, and obtaining a full remission for all his treasons. Though his son was, as has been seen, in communication with the English King on the part of the confederates of 1488, Darnley himself was too wary to take an overt part in the rising of that year. The termination of Lord Avandale's liferent by his death in July 1488 paved the way for Darnley's assumption of the title of Earl. His subsequent bargaining with the representatives of the second senior co-heiress is a curious chapter in the history of the time: and in 1490, after having been recently engaged in a revolt against his royal master, he succeeded in obtaining on his resignation a charter of the earldom to himself in liferent and his son in fee, after which each styled himself 'comes,' a proceeding which, it may be remarked, would have been quite accordant with feudal usage, had the resigner's title been unexceptionable.

late King), Lord Bothwell (John Ramsay), Ross of Montgrenane, and Murray of Cockpool, were charged with treasonably taking counsel with the English King, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Governor of Berwick, against their country's liberties, and stirring up James III. to appear in arms in violation of the conditions agreed to at Blackness.[1] Buchan was pardoned on his submission; but Ramsay and Ross were forfeited, the lands of the former, erected into an earldom, being bestowed on Lord Hailes (now Earl of Bothwell), and those of the latter on Hume of Fastcastle.[2] As a measure of conciliation towards the opponents of the Government, there was a provision that the heirs of those who had fallen with James III. at Sauchie might enter on their estates as if their predecessors had died at the King's peace; and an annuity was granted to such unlanded men as had appeared in arms on the same side. In hope of appeasing the indignation with which the King's death was likely

[2] Ross was afterwards restored to his lands, at the instance, it would appear, of the Pope, who had been moved to intercede for him by Henry VII., as a man illustrious for military science and moral probity (Rawdon Brown's Calendar of State papers in the archives of Venice, etc., No. 549: Reg. Mag. Sig. xii. 156, 240, 24th October 1489 and 18th Nov. 1490): and the Rolls of 1491 indicate that he was in the occupation of lands in Stewartoun and Kilmarnock as security for a fee of £21, 16s. 8d., 4 bolls malt and 4 sheep due to him for some unnamed office in the household, he being taken bound not to remove the present tenants.—Pages 267, 268, 272, 273. to be viewed abroad, the leading nobles affixed their seals to a parliamentary declaration, charging the slaughter committed in the field of Stirling, where the King's father and others "happenit to be slane" on perverse counsel given to James III., the present King and his friends being acquitted of all blame. Orders were given for the destruction of the fortress of Dunbar, whose demolition had indeed begun before this time.[1] An embassy, consisting of a Bishop, an Earl or Lord of Parliament, a clerk and a knight, with fifty horsemen, was ordered to proceed to the Courts of France, Brittany, and Spain, in order to confirm friendly relations with these countries, and to make search for a wife for the King. It must have been in connection with this rather than a later mission that the Bishop of Glasgow had in the Edinburgh customs' account of 1490 the custom of his wool allowed him to the extent of £33, 11s. 2d., for his expenses as ambassador.[2] In this as in subsequent years much information is to be gleaned from the Treasurers' Accounts of James' movements from week to week, sometimes almost from day to day, a careful summary of which during the first ten years of his reign is contained in Mr Dickson's valuable Preface to the first volume of that record. One of the most prominent features brought out is the King's habit, begun at the very outset of his reign, of attending the justice ayres in person. Some entries in the earliest Fife account in the present volume indicate a considerable stay made some time during the first year of his reign at Falkland, a favourite residence with him as with his predecessors.[1]

[1] Treasurers' Accounts, i. p. 91. The Exchequer accounts allude to an expenditure of wheat and peas to the extent of £27, 3s. 4d. on the occasion of a residence of the King in Dunbar Castle somewhere about this date.—Page 98.

Disaffection broke out before long in two different quarters. It is with surprise that we find two adherents of the government to whom Parliament had entrusted the preservation of peace in the west, Lord Lyle, the Justiciary, and the so-called Earl of Lennox, now Governor of Dumbarton Castle, organizing an insurrection in the district committed to their keeping, and holding out the fortress of Dumbarton against the Crown. They were in communication with another set of insurgents in the north, friends of James III., among whom Lord Forbes made himself conspicuous by displaying the late King's bloody shirt as the banner of revolt. A Parliament was assembled on 26th June 1489, when Lennox and his son and Lyle were forfeited; and it was agreed that the King, at the head of his host, should pass at once to Crookston and Duchal, while Argyll would be sent to bombard Dumbarton. Duchal was reduced, and the artillery were on their way back before the end of July: and on the 4th of that month the custumar of Linlithgow is credited with a disbursement of £10 as indemnification to Patrick Livingstone for destruction of his grain at Castlecary during two nights when the King and his host were in western parts.[2] Lennox, on his way north with the view of obtaining reinforcements, was surprised by Lord Drummond: but it was not till the beginning of December that Dumbarton surrendered.

The party in power showed signal forbearance towards these quondam adherents, whom they probably could not afford to alienate, the forfeitures of the Earl of Lennox, Matthew Stewart, and Lord Lyle being rescinded in the Parliament of February 1489–90, when a precept was issued to the Clerk Register to take the whole process out of the books of Parliament and destroy it, which was carried into effect.[1]

In December 1489 we find the King pursuing the favourite pastime of hawking at Falkland.[2]

A series of entries in the Rentals enables us to rectify in a measure the popular accounts of a savage outrage which occurred in Strathern in the course of the year 1490, the climax of a long-standing feud between the Drummonds and Murrays, in which eight score of the Murrays were burned to death by a body of Drummonds in the church of Monivaird, where they had taken refuge.[3] The chief offenders were brought to trial in October 1490, a date established by an entry in the Treasurer's account,[4] when

This revocation is mentioned in the grant to Sir Andrew Wood on p. 121, which, it will be remarked, is not the writ actually alluded to in the Fife account, but a later one engrossed in its place in consequence of the revocation having made it inoperative.

some of the most guilty of them, including, it is generally said, William Master of Drummond, son of the first and grandfather of the second Lord Drummond, were executed. The Rentals however show William Master of Drummond to have been alive and in occupation of lands in Strathern on 1st October 1492.[1] From the Acta Dominorum Concilii we learn that on 9th January 1490–1 Lord Drummond and Sir William Murray of Tullibardine entered into a bond in the King's presence to make reparation for all wrongs done by the second son of the former, then fugitive and at the horn for the burning of the Kirk of Monivaird and slaughter of the King's lieges.[2] Lindsay of Pitscottie's account of the fray makes the chief actor not William but "David Drummond" (not further designed) "whom the King punished afterward by heading of him with his complices at Sterling."[3] Now the Rentals in this volume specify David Drummond, a son of Lord Drummond unnoticed in the ordinary pedigrees, as in the tenancy of certain lands in Strathern, viz., Bordland of Ballach, Cargarthland, Quiltballach, Lochlyn, Trewin, and Dry Isle:[4] and it seems likely that it was not the Master of Drummond, but this

David who, fugitive and at the horn in January 1490–1, was overtaken soon afterwards by the vengeance of the law; inasmuch as in the record of some changes of possession in Strathern made on 18th May 1492 he is referred to as dead, and his holding of Quiltballach let to John Murray of Ballach (or Trewin); and it is added that this and other alterations of tenancy referred to are made of the consent and good will of Lord Drummond, in virtue of an agreement between him and Sir William Murray of Tullibardine.[1]

A Parliament held in April 1491 arranged that two embassies should set out, one to France and Spain with the view of seeking for a bride for the King, the ambassadors including the Bishop of Glasgow, Earl of Bothwell and others; the other to Denmark, to renew the existing commercial league with that country. The former embassy had a safe conduct from the King of England on 14th June;[2] but sailed direct from North Berwick for France,[3] and returned in November following without having gone to Spain. We find Bothwell allowed the custom of 18 sacks of wool for his expenses as ambassador.[4] These ambassadors

Two years earlier the Acta Dominorum Concilii (pp. 90, 99) inform us of a dispute between John Murray of Trewin and David Drummond regarding the possession of the Isle of Monivaird, otherwise called Dry Isle, which was decided by the Lords in favour of Drummond as having right under a lease from the Crown.

obtained a ratification of the alliance with France,[1] and also entered on the subject of a matrimonial treaty (though it does not appear who the destined bride was), for the final arrangements regarding which it was appointed in the succeeding Parliament (20th February 1491–2) that another embassy, consisting of a Bishop, an Earl, a Lord of Parliament, and a clerk, with 100 horse be despatched to France.[2]

The embassy to Denmark did not set out till May 1492.[3] It consisted of Lord Ogilvy of Airlie, Master John Liston, and Rothesay Herald, the last named of whom died when abroad on this mission, as appears from a payment allowed in 1493 to his widow, who died in Denmark in the King's service.[4]

The proceedings of the Parliament of February 1491–2 testify to the continued existence of a wide-spread feeling against the party in power as being implicated in the late King's death, an impression which they tried to combat by offering a reward of 100 marks worth of land to any one who should make known to the King who were the actual slayers of his father with their own hands, and declaring guilty concealment of this matter to be equivalent to treason.[5]

As James advanced in years, his penitence for his share in the events of 1488 would naturally tend to loosen the ties between him and the faction in whose hands he had been a tool, and probably prompted the forbearance which he occasionally showed even to the least worthy of his father's friends, Ramsay for example, who, though not restored to his lands or title, was allowed to return to Scotland and received into favour. Before long both sides became implicated in intrigues with Henry VII. against their sovereign. The policy of the English King towards Scotland, as towards his neighbours generally, seems to have been really pacific: and it can only be supposed that his motive in fomenting disaffection was to involve the young King in internal troubles, which, acting as a restraint on his impetuous temper, would be a safeguard against external war. It was probably with some such view that in April 1491 Henry listened to a project of Ramsay and Sir Thomas Tod, to which the Earl of Buchan was also said to be a party, to deliver into his hands the King of Scots and his brother the Duke of Ross.[1] It is perhaps more remarkable to find Henry in similar relations with the mainspring of the late revolution, the Earl of Angus. The virtual

[1] Tod had been moneyer to James III. (vol. ix. page 548), was a burgess of Edinburgh, had had Sheriffhall in Midlothian conveyed to him by the Abbot of Dunfermline on the forfeiture of James Gifford (Chartulary of Dunfermline, p. 372), and in 1488 was Comptroller of the Household (pp. 40, 58, 102) and provost of Edinburgh (Edinburgh Council Records). He reappeared in Scotland as a knight in 1491, was that year again provost of Edinburgh (Records of Convention of Royal Burghs, i. p. 54), and resumed under James IV. the functions of moneyer.

head of the house of Douglas, accustomed to yield the pas to none of the Scottish nobility, and even to dictate terms to the Crown, may perhaps have chafed at the independent spirit which James was exhibiting, or resented the overweening influence of the upstart houses of Home and Hepburn. An agreement is yet in existence in two imperfect copies, by which Archibald Earl of Angus in conjunction with his son binds himself to do his utmost to prevent his sovereign from attacking England, and stipulates that, should war break out and he be unable to keep his own, he will deliver up his fortress of Hermitage Castle to Henry on condition of receiving from him an equivalent in England.[1] This intrigue seems to have become wholly or partially known to James. There are indications in the Treasurers' Accounts of Angus having fortified himself in Tantallon Castle, and of siege operations being conducted against him;[2] and James certainly curtailed his power by getting him to surrender Liddesdale, Angus obtaining by way of compensation, first Kilmarnock, and afterwards (probably in consequence of the annexation of that fief in 1469 making his possession of it liable to question) the lordship of Bothwell.[3]

In August 1495, Angus renders his account as lessee of Kilmarnock, still a Crown possession, but let to him for 400 marks (pp. 516, 518). The same account indicates that he had become Chancellor on the death of the Earl of Argyle.

Along with all this, there were frequent prolongations of the truce with England; and on May 28th 1493 we find Henry suggesting the project of a marriage between the King of Scots and a descendant of the English royal house, Katherine daughter of James Earl of Wiltshire and Ormond, by Eleanor daughter of Edmund Duke of York, Henry's granduncle.[1]

III.

The lawless condition of the Highlands and Islands seems about this time to have forced itself on James's attention. Thirteen years had passed since the overgrown power of the Lord of the Isles had been abridged by his compulsory surrender to the Crown of the earldom of Ross and of Kintyre and Knapdale; but this necessary step had not been effective in establishing order and tranquillity either in north or in west. The chief disturber of the peace for some time was the same Angus Og who had been the masterspirit of the rebellion of 1462, and who, though but an illegitimate son of the Island potentate, had in 1476 been constituted heir to his title as a Lord of Parliament, and to his domains. The revolt of this Angus, and the measures taken to suppress it, are matters belonging to the reign of James III. on the rather obscure chronology of which the Exchequer Rolls shed but a faint light. The culminating point of the insurrection was an inroad into Ross on the pretext of a quarrel with Kenneth Mackenzie of Kintail, formerly a vassal of the Earl of Ross, but now holding his lands directly from the Crown, and rising into the position of a prominent chief: and in the course of this invasion Angus's career is said to have been brought to a close by the dagger of a harper at Inverness. The accounts tell us that the waste condition of great parts of Ross, doubtless the result of these troubles, was the subject of an inquest in 1486:[1] and they also indicate that the burgh of Inverness suffered materially in the disorders of the time.[2]

An expedition conducted by a nephew of the Lord of the Isles belongs to the period covered by this volume. Alexander of Lochalsh, son of the Earl's illegitimate brother Celestine, placing himself at the head of the vassals of the Isles, made a renewed effort with their aid, and probably with his uncle's concurrence, to recover the lands of the earldom of Ross. The insurgents penetrated through Badenach to Inverness, where Farquhar Mackintosh, son of the Captain of the Clan Chattan, stormed and captured the Castle, and then plundered the lands of Cromarty. The next

[1] Vol. ix. page 404.

[2] The accounts of 1487 and 1488 show large and accumulating arrears of burgh fermes due by the bailies of that town (page 150, also vol. ix. page 456); and immediately before Sauchieburn, James III. had, at the intercession of the Master of Huntly, remitted all bygones in consideration of the impoverished condition of the town. This remission (printed in Fraser Mackintosh's 'Invernessiana,' p. 160), was doubtless struck at by the Act Rescissory of 1488.

object of Lochalsh was to get possession of the lands of the Mackenzies, who, however, under their chief, attacked and defeated the islesmen, and succeeded in expelling them from Ross. But the lawless acts of the Mackenzies themselves were such that the Earl of Huntly was obliged to resort to proceedings against them as oppressors of the lieges.[1]

In 1492 the account of the bailies of Inverness is rendered at a special diet held in that burgh some months after the meeting of Exchequer, and goes back for three years. It is there set forth how the town has been wasted by wars and tumults, the Castle destroyed, and the burgesses and inhabitants reduced to poverty; in consideration of which circumstances the provost and bailies have been allowed to compound with the Lords of

[1] The Ross accounts during both reigns attest the resistance made to the Crown by Kenneth Mackenzie in the way of non-payment of the fermes of the lands (Ardovale and others) held by them in lease. In the earliest account of the earldom of Ross, that of 1479, the arrears due by him are said to be £141, 5s. 4d., 5 chalders 4 bolls oatmeal, the same of oats, 22 marts and 17 sheep (vol. viii. page 599). The account of 1480 narrates how, Hugh 1st Lord Lovat having pledged a part of his lands of Kinneill for the fermes due by Mackenzie, these lands were apprized by the Sheriff of Forfar and taken possession of by the Crown (vol. ix. page 61). But Mackenzie, in conjunction with some smaller Crown tenants, continued to resist payment year after year, and to deforce the Crown officers: and in 1489 his arrears (along with those of these other tenants) are specified as £193, 10s. 10d., 103 chalders 12 bolls barley, 113 chalders 12 bolls oatmeal, 91 chalders 6 bolls oats, 212 marts and 202 sheep; and the King is called on to say what remedy should be resorted to (page 95). Ross was then the appanage of the King's younger brother; and therefore the accounts of that earldom or dukedom do not go beyond the period of that prince's pupillarity, which terminated in March 1489–90. In the latest Ross account, that of 1490 (page 216), the discharge side is wanting.

Council for a payment of £35, 13s. 4d. in lieu of the balance actually due, namely £375, 0s. 8d., 35 lbs. pepper.[1]

It must have been in the Parliament which met in May 1493 that the final sentence of forefeiture was pronounced against the Lord of the Isles. His attainder, though it does not appear in the extant proceedings of that Parliament, is narrated in the charters of his forfeited lands.[2] In the following month of January this last Lord of the Isles made in presence of the King a submission and surrender of his lands, in consideration of which he was allowed to become a Court pensioner in the Royal household. A payment of £133, 6s. 8d. for his maintenance and that of his servants, occurs in the Edinburgh customs' account rendered in 1495; and a similar entry appears in the account of 1498,[3] in which year the Lord of the Isles is said to have died in the Monastery of Paisley.

But the allegiance of the islesmen was yet far from secure: and the King's determination to uphold the supremacy of the law, as well perhaps as the restless activity and love of adventure which were marked traits in his character, prompted him to undertake a series of expeditions to establish his authority in the islands, and reduce the refractory chieftains to obedience. His first visit to the west took place in August 1493, on the 18th day of which month he was probably at Dunstaffnage. There is an entry after date and beyond the period of this volume to the effect that 30 bolls of oatmeal were supplied from Stirlingshire to Maurice Wardlaw, baker, as provision for the King when in the islands in 1493;[1] but his stay seems not to have been of long duration.[2] Later in the season we find him on the scene of the late disturbances in Ross. The Moray account rendered in 1494 makes mention of £32 paid by the Comptroller for seed oats for the Mains of Dingwall "ad utilitatem regis," of a horse provided for William Douglas, son of Hugh Douglas, for his journey northwards with the King, of £19, 15s. 11d. paid to the Comptroller for the King when in those parts, also of 67 sacks of victuals carried from Moray to Cromarty, Tain, the Chanonry of Ross, and other places, at the time when the King was in northern parts, an allowance being made to the poor labourers to whom the sacks belonged as compensation for their destruction.[3] The Great Seal Register contains a Crown charters to Duncan Mackintosh, Captain of Clan Chattan, and to John Makgilleoun of Lochbuy, of the lands which they had formerly held as vassals of the Lord of the Isles, seem to show that these chiefs had made their submission when the King was in the Isles in August:[2] and it seems to have been at the same time that knighthood was conferred both on Alexander of Lochalsh and on John of Isla, grandson and representative of Donald Balloch.

In the succeeding month of December we find allusions to the King's "venaciones" in Glenartney and Glenfinlas;[3] and at Christmas James was entertaining a French embassy in Edinburgh.[4]

The King must have gone twice to the Isles in 1494, his first visit being in May, as shown by the mention in the Moray account of 1499 of 6½ barrels of salmon sent him when "apud insulares" and entered after the 6th May in the household books.[5] The Treasurers' Accounts bear that on 5th July letters were sent to the Lords of the Westland, Southland, and Eastland, summoning them to meet the King at Tarbert.[6] On 24th July James was at Tarbert with ships, artillery, and other munitions of war. reign erected a large fortress on the east side of the isthmus of Tarbert, of the expenses of building which an interesting account is to be found in an early Exchequer Roll.[1] This castle had probably become ruinous in the troublous times that followed; and James now set himself to repair or rebuild it. The accounts of Stirlingshire and of Fife of this date specify large quantities of malt as sent to the King's host at Tarbert and to victual the castle there.[2] The Bute account informs us of six marts being sent from that island to the workmen at Tarbert, of £7 being paid for victuals to John Irvine, master of the ship Christopher and his comrades, also of two chalders of barley given to Lord Lyle and Donald Owr for the provisioning of Tarbert Castle.[3] But the further step taken by James of garrisoning Dunaverty, the castle occupying the southermost point of Kintyre, gave serious umbrage to the newly made knight, Sir John of the Isles, who stormed and captured that place, and hung the body of the governor from the wall, in sight, it is said, of the King and his ships, an act which did not go unpunished, the Knight of Isla and his sons being soon afterwards captured, brought to Edinburgh, and executed.[4] M'Kane of Ardnamurchan, by whom they had been arrested, was rewarded with a charter of lands in Isla, with the office of bailie of that Island, which he had formerly held under the Lord of the Isles.[1]

Wheat, marts, and sheep are entered in a Moray account long after date as having been supplied to the King while at Elgin and Inverness in October 1494;[2] and about the same date 30 marts were paid by the custumars of Edinburgh to the Treasurer for behoof of the Earl of Sutherland.[3] The insanity of John Earl of Sutherland was at that time the subject of an inquest at the northern ayres. The barons and freeholders of the northern sheriffdoms were summoned to Inverness to the serving of the brieve of idiotry,[4] but the inquest was adjourned, first to Aberdeen, and then to Edinburgh.[5]

Christmas of 1494 was spent by James at Edinburgh;[6] immediately after which he was expected at Dundee, and John Rollok, custumar of that town, into whose house he was to have lodged, makes a claim of damage for provisions prepared for him, which were lost or spoiled in consequence of [5] Acta Dominorum Concilii, pp. 378, 379. That the Earl was found insane, appears from a note regarding his tutory in the Treasurer's Accounts (i. p. 221), and from certain after proceedings, of date 9th Feb. 1478–9, to be found in the unprinted Acta Dominorum Concilii (lvii. f. 114) including an order to Sir James Dunbar of Cumnock to convey the Earl and his minor son to the King, and to provide in the meantime for their expenses. It appears from the same record that there was then a process of divorce or nullity of marriage going on against the Earl at the instance of "Fingole his spouse," which the Lords of Council of the same date referred to the spiritual courts. Fingole is unmentioned in the received accounts of the Sutherland family; where, on the authority of Sir Robert Gordon, Margaret, daughter of the Lord of the Isles is the only wife assigned to Earl John.

his non-arrival.[1] Instead of the contemplated visit to Dundee, James seems to have made a hurried journey to Bute with the "Lords of the Westland."[2]

In his visit to the Isles in the following May James was accompanied by a larger force, and the preparations which had been made were on a greater scale than formerly. A great row-barge and two boats had been built at Dumbarton, where also the already mentioned ship Christopher had been repaired at considerable cost. The Treasurers' Accounts contain minute and most valuable details of these shipbuilding operations.[3] The ship Flower, with Sir Andrew Wood as commander, which had shortly before come from Flanders, seems to have formed part of the armament.[4] A considerable number of entries occur of provisions sent to the fleet, including 20 chalders wheat from Moray,[5] 6 chalders wheat from Bute,[6] an unspecified amount of wheat from Fife, of which 2 chalders were baked into loaves that became spoiled,[7] 14 chalders malt from Fife,[8] 6 chalders malt and afterwards 14 bolls malt from Stirlingshire, the last named supply being sent to the Isles.[9] £3 were paid for carriage of wheat and malt from Abercorn to Glasgow when the host was there,[10] and £9 were paid for carriage of victuals from Strathern to Dumbarton for the host when in the Islands, the payment being made by the Chamberlain of Strathern in default of the carriage being performed by the tenants of Balquhidder.[1]

The King seems to have arrived at Dumbarton from Glasgow on his way to the Isles in the first week of May. We find charters granted by him at Dumbarton on 5th May, and on the following day at Newark Finlastown near Port-Glasgow.[2] If the King was not in Bute some of his suite must have been there on or before 4th May, as appears from a supply of 29 marts and 9½ chalders malt with which the Chamberlain of Bute credits himself as expended there by the household.[3] On 18th May the King grants a charter dated at Meware (Mingarry) Castle in Ardnamurchan, where he doubtless was then.[4] Charters granted, [3] Pages 478, 479. The malt is said to have been entered in the household books on 4th May, the marts on 22nd and 30th June.

[4] Reg. Mag. Sig., xiii. 204. Mr Dickson, in his Preface to the Treasurers' Accounts (vol. i. p. clxvi), administers a wholesome caution against the common error of relying implicitly on the place where a Crown charter is dated as evidence that the King was there, and regards it as certain that charters were sometimes dated where the Chancellor was, when the King was elsewhere. On this same 18th May, when a charter of Keir to the son of Sir William Stirling on his father's resignation is dated at Mingarry, two confirmation charters were granted to the Earl of Bothwell, dated at Glasgow (Reg. Mag. Sig., xiii. 339, 340). There is no difficulty in supposing that formal charters like the two last mentioned were sealed in presence of the Chancellor, but in absence of the King, at the place where they are dated. But in the case of the charter dated at Mingarry, it seems reasonable to believe that Sir William Stirling was in the King's suite, and made formal resignation into his hands at that place; while the Great Seal, which could not be in both places on one day, must shortly after the King's return home, to Makgilleoun of Dowart, the Captain of Clan Cameron, and M'Neill of Barra, make it probable that James's determined attitude had had its effect with these chieftains.[1] On the other hand, Farquhar Mackintosh and Mackenzie of Kintail were committed to ward in Edinburgh Castle.[2]

The King now assumed possession of Isla and Tiree. The Bute account of 1495–6 contains a disbursement of barley and marts to the Comptroller while letting these islands.[3]

There are several allusions in the accounts of 1496 to the visit to Scotland of the pretended Duke of York: but as the subject of James's relations with Perkin Warbeck becomes more prominent in the immediately succeeding years, it seems better to reserve what remarks fall to be made on it to the Preface to the next volume.

APPENDIX TO PREFACE.

No. I.

Death of the last Earl of Douglas.

The date of the death of James, ninth and last Earl of Douglas, has often been given as 15th April 1488. In noticing in the Preface to Volume Ninth (page lv) the mention in the English records of date 2nd February 1486–7, of "Anna que fuit uxor Jacobi Douglas comitis de Douglas," the question was raised, but not answered whether these words should be taken as implying that the Earl was then dead. The inquiry seems to be answered in the negative in the present volume. Sir James Douglas, Knight, whom it is not easy to identify with any one but the ex-Earl, had, the Kinclevin account of 1489 informs us, a pension of £200 granted him under the Great Seal of James IV. The grant is unrecorded in the Great Seal Register, but payments of a portion of it (namely £121, 6s. 8d.) which was allocated on the fermes of Kinclevin, etc., appear in the accounts of 1489, 1490, and 1491. In the Kinclevin account rendered July 1491 (page 253) the accountant is credited with the whole £121, 6s. 8d. as paid "quondam Jacobo Dowglas, militi," which is said to be in satisfaction of his debts, besides a balance of arrears paid to his factors. It therefore seems that the last Earl of Douglas died, not earlier, but later than the usually assigned date, namely, in 1491. But, if so, how are the words "que fuit uxor" to be explained? If he actually became a monk at Lindores, he may perhaps have been required to renounce his wife: but it is also supposable that there may have been a divorce on some unknown ground.
